Methodologic rigor in pediatric oncology: lessons learned from a survey. To determine what constitutes "rigorous" methods of conducting treatment studies in pediatric oncology, we surveyed the members of the Pediatric Oncology Branch (Swanstrom, CT) of the National Cancer Institute (NCI) regarding the key features for this type of study. The questionnaire included 10 questions to which respondents responded using a 4-point Likert scale (1 = least rigorous; 4 = most rigorous). The mean score was 3.96 +/- 0.19. The 9 most rigorously-applied features were 1) prospective study design; 2) descriptive analysis only; 3) sample size estimator for group; 4) power calculations; 5) randomization; 6) baseline measurements; 7) standardized treatment protocols; 8) inclusion of at least two control groups; and 9) use of control group for comparison. Responses to each question were compared with those from previous surveys of an adult population (Fisher et al., 1986; Govindan et al., 1997) to determine whether these methodological standards were applicable to pediatric cancer research. Rigorous protocols were highly variable among the responding pediatric oncology studies, and many were consistent with adult cancer research. To validate the use of these standards for pediatric cancer research, this data should be compared with other survey data in pediatric oncology.Q: Bash - Nested loop with exit Does anyone know of an elegant way to exit a bash script after executing a nested loop? In other words, I have a script that loops through multiple files (one by one) and uses some other functions that also loop on one file at a time. I want to call one of the functions, wait for it to complete and then call another one of the functions but only if the first one is fully completed. Tried using two if statements inside a for loop which is absolutely horrible. A: There is no elegant way to do this in bash, but you can use a GNU extension using an array: #!/bin/bash # Two functions finalIteration() { echo "Loop complete" return } parentLoop() { local result=() # One-at-a-time usage of two functions # Inside a loop we can access it using the # element-based syntax ${array[i]} i=0;

Aging and the consequences of Alzheimer's disease. Aging in general is associated with disease and disability, which may affect cognitive function, and there is increasing evidence that this may be related to the extent and pervasiveness of brain pathophysiology. Many neurological and psychiatric diseases may become more prevalent with age, including Alzheimer's disease (AD), vascular dementia, Lewy body dementia, dementia with Lewy bodies, frontotemporal dementias, Parkinson's disease, multiple sclerosis and primary psychiatric illnesses such as major depression and bipolar disorder. The number of people with a dementing illness is projected to increase significantly by 2020 and the total number of people with dementia (primary and secondary) in the world is expected to increase from 47.5 million in 2010 to 65.7 million by 2050. Prevalence of mild cognitive impairment (MCI) is high with 11% of those in the community over the age of 65 being affected, with the incidence of this condition doubling every 5 years. It is associated with clinically significant rates of non-mild dementia in up to 60% of patients, and as a result, there has been considerable interest in the role of MCI in prodromal or prodromal AD. Individuals who are older with no cognitive impairment (NCI) are also at risk of developing AD-type pathology, with the likelihood of this occurring depending on the genotype of APOE. So far, cross-sectional studies suggest that lower educational attainment, lower intelligence and higher age are associated with greater risk of dementia and AD, although in all these studies, over time the effect of education appears to diminish. Longitudinal studies suggest that the incidence of dementia and AD is higher in the higher educational group. Although an association exists between education and cognitive function, it is plausible that greater exposure to education is associated with reduced risk of cognitive impairment due to the accumulation of protective factors such as social networks, cultural and physical activity, and other lifestyle and health behaviors. There is growing evidence that subjects who are older with lower cognitive function tend to have higher levels of oxidative stress, neuroinflammation and neuronal damage. Longitudinal studies are required to establish to what extent these factors influence cognitive function, and whether disease progression increases the likelihood of lower cognitive function. Neuropsychological assessment may be useful in distinguishing dementia and MCI from NCI, but it is less useful in determining risk of developing dementia or MCI. The relationship between clinical dementia and neuroimaging is promising. Longitudinal studies are required to better establish the role of neuro
